Welcome to the epic saga of Ricochet Infinity, the hilarious new puzzle. I get thisÅ .Q: How can I wrap a TestMethod with a functionality? Some information before my question: I'm using NUnit. I've got a code like this: public class MyTest { [TestMethod] public void MyTest() { MyFunction.DoSomething(); } } This method is executing very often. Now, I want this function to be executed just once before running every time this test runs. I need the result of that function and I can't do anything to write another method to test because this method will be executed many times. I want to do something like this: public class MyTest { [TestMethod] public void MyTest() { DoSomething(); } } And I get the result from the DoSomething() and I don't want to execute it every time this method is called. How can I achieve this using NUnit? A: Depending on what you actually want to achieve, you have two basic options: Don't instantiate a completely new method for each test Use a custom fixture Using a custom fixture you can create the fixture in your test class, with logic you want to run before every test, and restore the fixture state back to default state after each test. Unfortunately, this is not sufficient for most cases. If you don't want to run your function more than once, just one time before, then you cannot use a fixture. This is because by using fixtures you need to provide a new way of restoring state between tests. If you don't have that requirement
